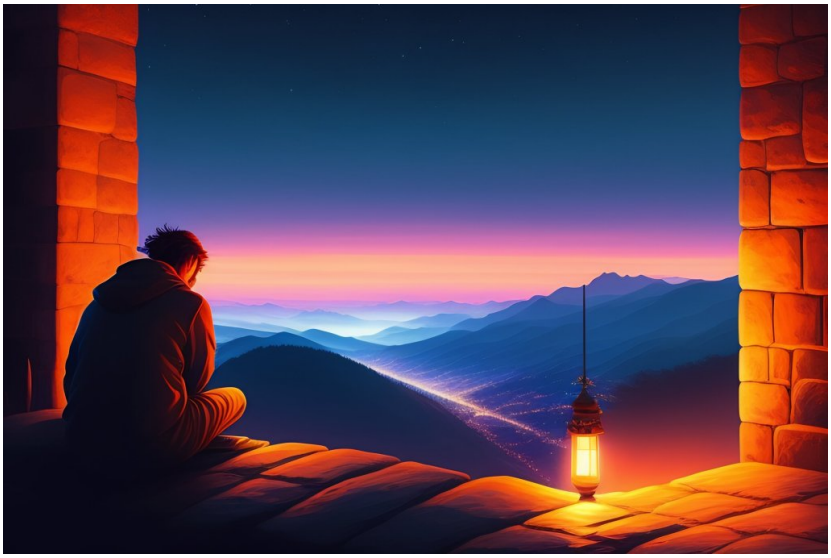
Embracing Worthiness: Deserving Love Unconditionally.

thelifeofmine3.wordpress.com/2023/09/01/embracing-worthiness-deserving-love-unconditionally/

September 1, 2023

Hello, please allow me to share, inquire, or speak about something about myself.

I'm 27 years old and a disabled girl; no sensation below my waist indicates that I'm a paralysed girl or woman.
So tell me I'm putting suggestions on people's hands right now! Can I have a relationship with a guy? Do I deserve to be loved? People may say, "Yes, I can," without knowing anything. Let me give you a quick rundown of the situation.



If I am your family or a friend who has known my medical terms of living and struggles for many years? Will you allow me have relationship, being in this society of culture terms? Love leads to relationships, which lead to marriage, which leads to the union of two families. It refers to a society. That is diverse in many ways, such as religion, language, and most importantly, caste. We may claim to be separate from caste, but deep down, we disagree. That was well known among the Indians, right?

Okay, put this and everything else aside. Now consider parents who are proud of their children and the people around them. What stopped us from being ourselves?

We can tell ourselves not to listen to anyone and move on with our lives. However, this is not a realistic possibility! We live in society and are part of it. We despise people judging us, but we will be judged, and we are judging others.

Ok, I just want a solution!
I don't want to get married and go to that life of being with family culture, but I would prefer having someone in my life as companionship doesn't mean living in a relationship or a term of friends with benefits. I like to have relationship without commitments (because of my condition)

What would you call this connection? People may refer to me as a jerk, another type of love or living together, or even a slut. Everyone has an opinion, right?

But how should I refer to it in real life?

How can a disabled girl convince her parents, who have cared for her in every way for the past 27 years?

How can a disabled girl convince her “so-called bestie,” who she thought would be with her but abandoned her during her difficult times, that she still wanted to express herself once?

How can a disabled woman convince her man that she cannot be with him as a girlfriend, wife, or mother to his child?

How can a disabled girl convince her man’s parents that she will not jeopardise their son’s life by participating in this?

How can a disabled girl convince her family that she deserves a man in her life?

How can a disabled girl convince this society and her friends that she will not marry but she has a person in her life who is second only to her parents?

I accept that I cannot have a family, but I still love and rely on him. Please do not pass judgement on me or refer to me as a slut. I’m physically disabled, but I have a feeling in my heart that I can’t accept my mental illness!

Do I deserve to be love?

“In the depths of your being, you are inherently worthy of love, deserving of affection and acceptance, just as you are.”